

William Penn, to ensure the success of Philadelphia as a commercial center, claimed what he called the Lower Counties (now Delaware) as part of his Pennsylvania Colony in spite of competing claims by Maryland's Lord Baltimore. The boundary dispute was finally settled with the establishment of the Mason-Dixon Line in 1767 (see page 49).